Pursuit (Truth)

Have you ever missed your exit on the interstate?

Larry, my late older brother, loved to tell a story about a time he and my sister, Ann, were driving to visit our parents. Ann was behind the wheel while my brother slept in the passenger seat. She didn't want to wake him, even though she realized something wasn't right, so she kept driving.

Eventually, she woke our brother and said, "I think we're lost."

Together (Truth)

We come to our final episode of this series as our nation celebrates the Declaration of Independence, adopted 250 years ago. For the most part, our experiment in representative democracy is working, despite some daunting challenges along the way.

However, it feels as though something precious, something protected by the Declaration, although it isn't specifically named, is slipping away.

Larry looked around and quickly realized they weren't just a few miles off course. They were in a state they had never intended to enter.

The problem wasn't that the car had stopped moving. It was moving just fine. The problem wasn't that Ann wasn't a good driver. She is a safe and conscientious driver. The problem was that somewhere back along the highway, they missed the right exit.

I suspect most of us have had a similar experience. I know I have. We become distracted. We assume we're headed in the right direction. We keep making progress. Then one day, we realize we're not where we intended to be.

This week, we come to one of the most familiar phrases in the Declaration of Independence: "Life, Liberty, and the Pursuit of Happiness."

The Declaration doesn't guarantee happiness. It protects our freedom to pursue it. Which raises an important question. What are we pursuing?

Every day, our culture points us toward another exit. "This is what will make you happy." "This is what you've been missing." "If you can just get here, then you'll finally be satisfied."

Before taking another exit, it might be wise to ask yourself a simple question: Check your exit.

An interstate is full of exits. Life is too. But, not every exit leads where we hope. Also, have you ever noticed how quickly yesterday's dream can become today's disappointment?

We work hard for something we've wanted for months, sometimes years. We save our money. We anticipate the day it finally becomes ours. A new vehicle. A larger home. A promotion. A new phone. A long-awaited vacation.

For a while, we're excited. We should be. There is nothing wrong with enjoying life's blessings.

But then something happens. The excitement begins to fade. Before long, we're looking toward the next purchase, the next accomplishment, the next goal, the next thing that promises to make life complete.

Most of us have lived that story.

It's one reason advertisers spend billions of dollars every year convincing us that happiness is just one more exit down the road. If only we had a little more. A little newer. A little bigger. A little more impressive. We keep driving because the next exit promises what the last one couldn't deliver.

That same pursuit plays out on a much larger stage.

The Declaration of Independence protects our freedom to pursue happiness. But it wisely leaves another question unanswered.

Where is happiness actually found?

Perhaps that's why the story of the Lincoln Memorial Reflecting Pool has captured so much attention.

A reflecting pool has one purpose: to reflect. It draws our eyes beyond itself. We see the Washington Monument stretching toward the sky. We see the Lincoln Memorial standing as a reminder of a nation still striving toward its highest ideals. Sometimes, if we look carefully enough, we even see ourselves.

Maybe that's why this week's story has lingered in my mind. It raises a question far more important than the future of a reflecting pool.

What are we reflecting?

That is hardly a new question. More than six hundred years before the birth of Jesus, the prophet Jeremiah watched Judah's leaders pursue grand projects while neglecting justice. God challenged King Jehoiakim through the prophet: "Your father gave the poor and needy their rights, and all went well for him. That is what it means to know me." (Jeremiah 22:16)

Upcoming Worship Series "Mortgaged"

Most of us think of a mortgage as a loan on a house. We receive something valuable today and agree to pay for it over time. At its best, a mortgage helps build a future. A family finds a home. A community grows stronger. An investment today creates something of lasting value tomorrow.

But not every mortgage builds the future.

Sometimes we trade what matters most for what matters now. We sacrifice lasting goods for temporary pleasures. We exchange truth for convenience, relationships for success, stewardship for profit, and contentment for endless accumulation. We consume gifts we did not create and borrow against tomorrow, leaving someone else to pay the bill.

Page 5

Book Club News

Beginning July 12, we begin a new worship series titled Mortgaged.

You likely already know what a mortgage is. We borrow from the future in order to enjoy something today. Sometimes that borrowing helps us build something lasting. A home mortgage, for example, may create stability and opportunity for generations.

But not all mortgages work that way. Throughout this series, we'll explore a simple but important question: What are we borrowing from the future, and what are we leaving behind?

To accompany our conversations, we will be reading The Serviceberry: Abundance and Reciprocity in the Natural World by Robin Wall Kimmerer.

Many of you may recognize Kimmerer as the author of the bestselling book Braiding Sweetgrass. A botanist, teacher, and gifted storyteller, she invites readers to look at the natural world not merely as a collection of resources to consume, but as a community of relationships built on gift, gratitude, and mutual care.

At the center of the book is a simple observation.

When a serviceberry tree produces fruit, it does not create scarcity. It creates abundance. Birds eat. Animals eat. People eat. Seeds spread. New life grows. The tree participates in a cycle of generosity that benefits the entire community.

Upcoming Worship Series — “Mortgaged”

Whether we realize it or not, every life leaves an inheritance.

The question is not simply whether we are borrowing. The question is: What are we leaving behind?

Scripture begins with a gift. Before there was work, there was a garden. Before there was ownership, there was trust. Before there was abundance to enjoy, there was abundance to steward.

Everything we cherish—our lives, our families, our faith, our communities, even the earth itself—has been entrusted to us by God. We did not create these gifts. We received them.

Every generation must answer the same question: What will we do with what we've been given? Beginning July 12, we'll explore that question together in Mortgaged, a new worship series about stewardship, inheritance, gratitude, community, and joy. Together we'll wrestle with questions that touch every part of life:

What has God entrusted to us?

How much is enough?

What do we owe one another?

Can we love a future we may never see?

What kind of life bears fruit?

Along the way, we may discover something surprising. Stewardship is not primarily about giving things up. It is about discovering a better way to live.

Our culture often promises that joy can be purchased through more—more wealth, more possessions, more influence, more success. Yet Jesus points us toward a different kind of abundance. The deepest joy is found not in what we accumulate, but in what we cultivate. Joy grows in relationships. It grows in gratitude. It grows when we participate in God's work of bringing life, hope, and healing into the world.

That is why one question will guide us throughout this journey:

Are we leaving behind a harvest—or a bill?

Upcoming Worship Series — “Truth”

Our companion book for this series is The Serviceberry: Abundance and Reciprocity in the Natural World by Robin Wall Kimmerer.

You did not choose me ... I choose you and appointed you to go and bear much fruit, the kind of fruit that endures.

John 15:16

Drawing on the life of the humble serviceberry tree, Kimmerer invites readers to imagine an economy shaped not by endless consumption, but by gratitude, reciprocity, and shared abundance. Though not written as a Christian book, it beautifully complements our exploration of biblical stewardship and the common good.

Whether you join us for worship, participate in a Life Group, read the companion book, or simply come with an open mind and heart, we invite you to become part of the conversation.

Summer is a season of gardens, orchards, berries, and harvests. It reminds us that every seed matters, every season has its purpose, and every harvest begins with someone willing to plant.

What kind of future are we cultivating?

Are we leaving behind a harvest—or a bill?

Here is our schedule of episodes for our series. Sometimes details change based on what's going on in the world or simply because God has a better idea:

“Feed Flint”

A meal goes a long way for a senior living alone, a family struggling to make ends meet, or a child fearful of empty shelves at home. But for the residents of Flint who carry the effects of lead-tainted water, nutrition is critical. Feed Flint provides locally grown, chemical-free, fresh produce to residents living in and around Flint. And we're hoping that you can help us provide 10,000 meals this summer.

Feed Flint includes takeout meals, produce boxes with recipes, and home deliveries as part of our work to guide and support families in moving to sustainable abundance. The reality is that Michigan's food insecurity levels got worse during the COVID-19 pandemic, and this summer's recovery is leaving behind those at the most risk of having to miss meals.

Flint families continue to struggle with the ongoing effects of the water crisis.

We're bringing together the resources of the Asbury Community Development Corporation. This includes Asbury Farms, the South Flint Soup Kitchen, the Asbury Community Help Center, multiple food pantries, and our Sizzling Culture Mobile Food Trailer. Our plan is to care for our neighbors when they need it most. We accept all people as they are, and our doors are always open to anyone.

Asbury Farms provides locally grown produce used to create fabulous and nutritious meals. Our seed-to-table approach is community-based. This not only helps families make it through emergencies and crises. We help move families towards sustainable abundance.

Our Sizzling Culture program provides jobs and new skills to our city's youth. This includes year-round employment. Our staff and most of our volunteers come from the neighborhoods we support. We call this sustainable abundance because families move from need-based on scarcity to enough based on community-generated abundance.

Our work is also about food and justice. Our vision is a revitalized community where every resident can use their talents and passions for the common good, where children grow into active citizens. And all residents can enjoy safety, good health, and a culture that fosters life-long learning and satisfying lives. This summer, help us address food insecurity and strengthen Flint's budding local food system by supporting the Feed Flint campaign. Thank you for taking the time to see what we're doing and considering how you can help.

Kimmerer asks what might happen if we learned to see our lives through a similar lens. What if fulfillment comes not from accumulating more, but from participating more fully in relationships of generosity? What if the things we value most cannot be bought or sold? What if the future is something we are called to nurture rather than consume?

These questions lie at the heart of our faith as well. Scripture consistently reminds us that life is a gift, that creation is entrusted to our care, and that our neighbors are not competitors but companions. You do not need to read any or all of this book to follow our series. However, the book is a short and accessible read. We simply invite you to read along as we explore these themes together. Whether you read every page or simply join us for worship, we hope this book expands your imagination and helps us ask a deeper question together:

What kind of future are we creating for those who come after us?

Robin Wall Kimmerer. The Serviceberry: Abundance and Reciprocity in the Natural World. New York: Scribner, 2024.

Most Americans still believe in hard work. They still believe that people deserve an opportunity to build a good life, raise a family, contribute to their community, and retire with dignity. They may disagree passionately about how to accomplish those goals, but beneath those disagreements is a shared longing for something we have always called the “American Dream.”

That dream has never been about guaranteeing equal outcomes. It has been about preserving the possibility that ordinary people, through opportunity, responsibility, and perseverance, might flourish. It depends upon something larger than individual success. It depends upon the belief that we're in this together.

Think about a bridge. Most of us cross bridges without giving them a second thought. They quietly carry thousands of people every day—young and old, rich and poor, Republican and Democrat, lifelong citizens and first-time visitors. A bridge doesn't ask who deserves to cross. It simply does what it was built to do. Of course, bridges aren't free. They exist because generations before us believed that some things are worth building and maintaining together.

Our companion book ends by reflecting on that very idea. Walter Isaacson observes that the economic assumptions guiding our nation over the past several decades have created extraordinary prosperity for some while leaving many others wondering whether the American Dream is still within reach. Whether one agrees with every aspect of his analysis is less important than the question it raises:

Who should our economy serve?

That is a question worthy of honest debate. Yet increasingly, honest debate seems to be giving way to something else.

Rather than carefully weighing ideas, we are encouraged to dismiss them with labels. Instead of asking whether a proposal is wise, truthful, or serves the common good, we are told what to call it. Labels become substitutes for thinking. They are often chosen, not to invite conversation, but to end it before it begins.

Truth suffers whenever language is used that way.

That should concern every Christian. The Ninth Commandment does not merely prohibit lying in a courtroom. It calls God's people to bear truthful witness about our neighbors. Surely that includes refusing to misrepresent one another's motives, beliefs, and ideas for the sake of winning an argument or holding onto power.

The result is that most of us feel unheard. We work hard. We contribute to our communities. We care for aging parents, teach children, repair roads, grow food, start businesses, serve in hospitals, factories, and churches. Yet most of us wonder whether the leaders and institutions meant to serve “the people” still remember the people they were created to serve.

We rarely notice a bridge as it faithfully carries us across the river. We only notice it when it begins to fail. Perhaps the same is true of the common good. We rarely think about it until we begin to lose confidence that it will still carry us.

Perhaps that is why so many today are searching for leaders who speak about the common good rather than simply appealing to our fears or our grievances. Perhaps people are hungry for a public life where truth matters more than slogans, where ideas are judged honestly, and where our deepest disagreements are met with integrity rather than distortion.

What if our hunger is telling us something?

What if the deepest crisis we face is not simply political or economic?

What if we have forgotten what it means to belong to one another?

The American experiment did not begin God's story. It became another chapter in humanity's long struggle to learn to live together for the common good, continuing a story that began at creation's very beginning and was shared with us in scripture.

Not because America was set apart by God above every other nation. And not because our founders agreed on what Scripture says. But because every generation must wrestle with the same questions: How do people live together? How is power used? Who belongs? What does justice require?

Thousands of years ago, God's prophets spoke to people about God's vision for a different kind of community. A community where justice was stronger than power and peace was stronger than fear. Through the prophet Isaiah, God declared: "The effect of righteousness will be peace. The result of righteousness will be lasting security forever." (Isaiah 32:17)

Peace, in the Bible, is never simply the absence of conflict. It is the presence of right relationships—with God, with one another, and with creation. The Hebrew word shalom describes a community where people flourish together because justice and truth are allowed to take root.

Jesus brings that same vision to the present. When asked to summarize God's law, He did not speak first about individual success or personal achievement. He answered: "Love the Lord your God with all your heart, with all your soul, and with all your mind. This is the greatest and most important commandment." But then Jesus added, "The second most important commandment is like it: Love your neighbor as you love yourself" (Matthew 22:37–39).

It's critically important that we not forget that love of God and love of neighbor cannot be separated. The health of our relationship with God is revealed by the way we treat one another.

Paul also writes about God's vision in a letter to the church in Ephesus. Paul was writing to a church divided by history, ethnicity, religion, and culture, when he announces something extraordinary: "For Christ himself has brought us peace by making Jews and Gentiles one people. With his own body he broke down the wall that separated them and kept them enemies" (Ephesians 2:14).

Notice what Paul does not say. He does not say that one side defeated the other. He does not say that one group finally gained enough power to impose its will. He does not say that peace comes when everyone thinks alike.

Paul says that Christ tore down the wall. And whenever a wall comes down, the possibility of building a bridge appears.

You see, a wall divides. It separates. A wall teaches us to fear those on the other side. But Christ came, Paul reminds us, to remove walls, not reinforce them.

Paul's letter continues: "So then, you Gentiles are not foreigners or strangers any longer. You are now fellow citizens with God's people and members of the family of God" (Ephesians 2:19).

For centuries, Israel understood itself as God's covenant people. Their story was the story of God's faithfulness—from slavery in Egypt, through the wilderness, into the Promised Land. But now Paul announces something almost unimaginable. Through Christ, Gentiles are no longer outsiders looking in. They, too, have become fellow citizens and members of God's family.

Paul reminds us that Gentiles, including us, are fellow citizens and members of God's family. We are people who belong together.

That is the gospel, church.

According to scripture, God's purpose isn't merely to save isolated individuals. Although this is clearly an important part. More importantly, God's purpose has always been to create a people—a community shaped by truth, justice, mercy, and love. This is why we can view the American experiment as another chapter in humanity's ongoing struggle to learn how to live together.

And since Christ has declared us to become one people, then every question we ask about our common life begins here: How do we live together as people who already belong to one another?

What if we believe that Christ has really torn down the walls that divide us? What if we stopped treating those who disagree with us as enemies to defeat and began seeing them as neighbors to understand?

Imagine what that might look like.

Imagine becoming known as people who build bridges instead of walls. Not because bridges are easy to build. They aren't. They require patience, sacrifice, trust, and a willingness to meet someone halfway. But every bridge says something walls never can: there is another way.

It is through Christ that all of us are able to come in the one Spirit into the presence of God.

Ephesians 2:14-22

Imagine a country where truth mattered more than slogans. A nation where we judge ideas by their wisdom rather than by the labels attached to them. Where disagreement is not viewed as betrayal, but as an opportunity to learn.

Imagine an economy measured not only by the wealth it creates, but by the opportunities it provides. A society where success is celebrated, not because a fortunate few have prospered, but because ordinary families can work hard, care for one another, and still believe the future will be better for their children.

Imagine leaders who understand that public office is a public trust, not a pathway to personal glory.

Imagine citizens who refuse to reward lies, no matter who tells them, and who insist that truth is never negotiable because democracy itself depends upon it.

Imagine Christians becoming known, not for winning arguments, but for refusing to bear false witness. People who speak truth with humility, who listen before judging, who seek justice without hatred, and who remember that every person they meet bears the image of God.

This vision is not naïve. It is the vision of Isaiah. It is the vision of Jesus. It is the vision Paul describes when he tells us that Christ has made us one people.

Perhaps the greatest gift we could give our nation in its 250th year is not louder voices or stronger opinions. Perhaps it is a community willing to live as though we truly believe...We're in this together.

Over the past six weeks, we have explored some of the most important words in our faith and in our democracy. Us. Evident. Equal. Dignity. Pursuit. And today...Together.

Each week has reminded us that truth is more than getting our facts right. Truth shapes how we see one another. Truth decides whether power serves itself or serves the common good. Truth determines whether we build walls or bridges.

Walls protect us from people we fear. Bridges connect us to people we have yet to understand. Christ chose the bridge.

The day marking the 250th anniversary of our Declaration of Independence is over. Soon, the fireworks will be over. The flags will be folded away. And the celebration will begin to fade.

But the experiment continues.

Every generation must decide whether those words—all are created equal—will remain merely something we celebrate or become something we practice.

The church has a unique calling in that decision.

Long before there was an American experiment, God was already forming a people whose lives would bear witness to a different way of living together. A people shaped by truth instead of fear. By justice instead of favoritism. By mercy instead of vengeance. By love instead of power.

That calling now belongs to us.

Not because America is God's chosen nation. But because we are God's people. And wherever God's people are found, they are called to tell the truth, seek justice, love their neighbors, and work for the common good.

The Declaration gave our nation an extraordinary vision. Christ gives the Church its enduring mission. May we have the wisdom to hold both with gratitude.

And may future generations be able to say that, when truth was tested, we chose to stand together.

Jeremiah reminds us that greatness is not measured by what we build, but by whether people flourish because of our leadership.

Not long afterward, the prophet Ezekiel confronted Israel's shepherds. A common metaphor, in scripture, for the nation's political and religious leaders. Rather than caring for the weak, healing the sick, or seeking the lost, they had used their positions for their own benefit. Their leadership reflected self-interest instead of God's compassion.

Reading those ancient prophets, it's difficult not to recognize why so many people today feel unsettled. We know something isn't quite right. We see it in the headlines. We hear it in our conversations.

We even catch glimpses of it in recent elections, where many voters seem to be searching for a different kind of leadership. Whatever our political views, that longing itself tells us something important. Human beings instinctively hunger for leaders who help people flourish.

That brings us to Jesus.

Jesus heals a man who had been blind since birth. Instead of celebrating, the religious leaders interrogated him, pressured his parents, and eventually drove him from the synagogue.

Like the prophets before Him, Jesus also talked about shepherds. "The thief comes only in order to steal, kill, and destroy," He says. "I have come in order that you might have life—life in all its fullness." (John 10:10)

Jesus doesn't simply expose what false shepherds do. He reveals what God's leadership looks like.

The thief comes only in order to steal, kill, and destroy. I have come in order that you might have life—life in all its fullness.

John 10:10

If the road you're traveling steals life, divides people, or leaves your neighbors behind...Check your exit.

Where others take life, Jesus gives it. Where others divide, Jesus restores. Where others pursue themselves, Jesus pursues us.

The Declaration of Independence protects our freedom to pursue happiness.

Jesus shows us what that pursuit has been pointing toward all along: not a life centered on ourselves, but a life lived in all its fullness.

Several years ago, our congregation explored the ideas found in a book titled The Abundant Community by John McKnight and Peter Block.

We didn't simply read the book. We practiced it. Together, we learned to see our neighborhood differently.

Most communities are taught to begin with a simple question: "What's wrong here?" Professor McKnight and community organizer, Peter Block, suggested a better one: "What capabilities are already here?"

It's a remarkably hopeful way to see the world. Instead of beginning with problems, begin with people. Instead of focusing on deficiencies, discover gifts. Instead of asking what we lack, ask what God has already placed among us. That vision sounds remarkably like the life Jesus describes.

Life in all its fullness isn't measured by how much we accumulate for ourselves. It grows as we discover our gifts, share them generously, and help others discover theirs.

That's true for individuals. It's true for churches. It's true for communities. And it's true for nations. The pursuit of happiness isn't ultimately about getting more. It's about becoming more fully alive together.

Every day we choose which exits to take. Some exits promise success but leave us isolated. Some promise security but leave us fearful. Some promise greatness but leave our neighbors behind.

Jesus points us toward another road altogether—a road where our lives become a gift to others. Perhaps that's what happiness has been pointing toward all along.

Sooner or later, every interstate traveler comes to another exit. Some lead to restaurants. Some to gas stations. Some to rest areas. Some lead us home. Life is much the same. Every day, we make choices about what we will pursue, what will shape us, and ultimately what our lives will reflect.

The Declaration of Independence wisely protects our freedom to pursue happiness. Jesus invites us to pursue something even deeper. Life. Not merely existence. Not endless consumption. Not the next possession, promotion, or public recognition. But, life in all its fullness.

Perhaps that's why the prophets called leaders to seek justice before monuments. Perhaps that's why Jesus called himself the Good Shepherd instead of a king. And perhaps that's why the greatest joy we will ever experience isn't found in asking, "What can I get next?"

It's found in asking, "Whose life can I help flourish?"

May our lives reflect the One who came not to steal, kill, or destroy, but to give life. And when the next exit appears, may we have the wisdom—and the courage—to choose the one that leads there.
